The global third-party chemical distribution market has been steadily developing, owing to the creative steps being undertaken by the chemicals sector to counteract the supply chain system's slowdown. Chemical distributors around the world are implementing sustainable methods for the safe delivery of chemicals and materials, thereby increasing their credibility among chemical suppliers. The global outbreak of COVID-19 caused not only a partial collapse of the air transport, but also majorly impacted on the distribution channels of all the industries. When COVID-19 lockdowns made face-to-face meetings impossible for a period of time, distributors changed direction and discovered new ways to engage with clients. The rising use of digital technologies by oil, gas, and chemical firms has been driven primarily by efficiency gains and increased reliability. Many organizations in these industries experienced excellent results from advanced market sensing, improved operational optimization, and expanded usage of "in silico" simulations. Moreover, governments of various countries had allowed third-party distributions to work domestically and internationally, to distribute chemicals to the various industry verticals. Growing adoption of digitalization in the industries is thus, aiding the growth of third-party chemical distribution market.

The traditional chemical distribution business model is under greater strain than ever before. Industrial clients, over the years, have been increasingly focusing on procuring clear positioning from their suppliers across specific customer industries and value chains. The initiatives towards digitization of business models across chemical sector is also bringing about changes in functional needs for integrated and multidisciplinary product and service portfolios. Hence, the stated factor is expected to drive the growth of the third-party chemical distribution market over the forecast period. New companies are pushing their way into the chemical industry and their market segments; and digital platforms provides an opportunity in this regard. These platforms allow for broad and efficient market access, especially for small and medium-sized consumers in developing regions. Third-party chemical distribution market participants are incorporating advanced technologies in chemical distribution operations to provide the customers a safe, comfortable and an enhanced experience. For instance, Biesterfeld Group is primarily engaged in the international distribution of plastics, specialty chemicals, and rubbers, along with trading of industrial and agrochemicals, pharmaceutical raw materials and agents. Biesterfeld ChemLogS, which is a subsidiary of the corporation, is engaged in providing a wide range of services in the fields of chemical, quality, and safety management. ICC Chemical Corporation also distributes and trades in chemicals, polymers, and pharmaceuticals, having operations across the globe. ICC Chemical Corporation is ICC Industries Inc.'s global trading arm. The company supplies specialized and inorganic chemicals to diverse industries.
