Ceiling fans refer to a device installed on the ceiling of a room, with hub-mounted rotating blades that circulate the air, thus producing a destratification or cooling effect. They consist of aluminum or plastic blades, a capacitor, a flywheel, a holder, and a rotor. The warm air is attracted upward due to the rotation mechanism of the fan. In comparison to air conditioners and coolers, ceiling fans are more economical, energy-efficient, and have a longer shelf-life and lesser capital investment. In recent years, ceiling fans have gained traction in the GCC countries due to their widespread adoption in residential and commercial spaces.
