Market Dynamics:

The United States Container Glass Market is driven by increasing consumption of packaged beverages like bottled water, juices, milkshakes and other canned beverages. Over the past few years, sales of bottled water have grown significantly owing to rising health awareness among people regarding water quality and on-the-go consumption benefits. Container glass forms an integral part of the packaging for the booming beverage industry. Additionally, growth of ready-to-eat food market has also augmented the demand for glass containers like bottles, jars for food packaging applications in the country. Growth in food processing industry and expanding organized retail sector in the region has further propelled the market expansion of container glass during the forecast period.

Market Drivers:

Growing Demand from Packaged Food and Beverage Industry is Driving the U.S. Container Glass Market

The packaged food and beverage industry has been exhibiting high growth in the United States in recent years. Container glass is heavily used for packaging a variety of food and beverage products such as packaged foods, sauces, juices, alcoholic and non-alcoholic beverages. The increasing consumption of packaged and ready-to-eat food products is generating high demand for glass containers from the food industry.

Moreover, the rising health-consciousness among consumers has increased the demand for glass packaging as glass is considered a premium and hygienic packaging material compared to other options. Additionally, glass packaging preserves the taste, quality and freshness of food and beverages better than other materials. This increasing demand from the food and beverage packaging industry is a major driver for the growth of the U.S. container glass market.

Increased Imports of Cheaper Container Glass from Other Countries is the Key Market Restrain

The United States has been increasingly importing cheaper container glass products from other countries such as China in recent times. Cheaper labor and availability of raw materials at lower prices in countries such as China has made their glass products more cost-competitive compared to the glass manufactured domestically in the U.S. This rising import of cheaper container glass from overseas markets poses a serious challenge to the American glass manufacturers. It is putting downward pressure on their sales and profit margins. The price competitiveness of imported container glass is a major restrain for the growth and profitability of the U.S. container glass industry. It is compelling domestic glass producers to cut down their costs through various measures to remain competitive.
