Age-related Macular Degeneration Overview

Age-related Macular Degeneration (AMD) is a medical condition that affects the macula, the central part of the retina responsible for sharp, detailed vision. It is a leading cause of vision loss in older adults. AMD comes in two main forms: dry (atrophic) and wet (neovascular or exudative).

Age-related Macular Degeneration Market Insights

Age-related Macular Degeneration is the most common cause of severe loss of eyesight among people aged 50 and older. It affects the central vision and, with it, the ability to see fine details. In AMD, a part of the retina called the macula get damaged. Medication can help reduce the progression of the illness and prevent vision loss.

Age-related Macular Degeneration Treatment Landscape

the best available treatment for AMD was photodynamic therapy—in which an intravenous drug (injected into a vein) and laser were used to seal off leaking blood vessels. Past studies have found that just 1 year after diagnosis, less than 15% of patients given this therapy alone retain 20/40 vision, and up to 40% decline to 20/200 vision. However, advances in medical research have identified the Vascular Endothelial Growth Factor (VEGF) as a key pathophysiological factor in the development of neovascular AMD, with an essential role in angiogenesis, vascular permeability, and inflammatory response. The introduction of anti-VEGF intravitreal injections has opened a new therapeutic window in the management of wet AMD, thus efficiently blocking the pathophysiological process of AMD, with a restoration of retinal morphology and the maintenance of its function.

Age-related Macular Degeneration Market Size

According to the DelveInsight analysis, the United States accounted for the highest market size, with approximately 50% of the market share of Dry age-related Macular Degeneration (AMD) as compared to other countries of the 7MM in the year 2022. The Age-related Macular Degeneration market size of the 7MM is anticipated to increase in the forecast period due to expected launch of emerging therapies in the 7MM.
