From Appalachia to Florida, Americans lost their homes, businesses, and family members. The devastation is widespread, and more than a month left of Hurricane Season, the danger is far from over for Florida and the Gulf states.

Our #1 goal is to save lives on the roads. We want emergency personnel and truckers transporting critical supplies to have the tools to drive safely while they move throughout the affected regions.”

Lydia Wommack, Director of Marketing

Fortunately, Americans come together in the wake of tragedy. Within hours of Hurricanes Helene and Milton hitting their respective areas, people from across the country were donating to the Red Cross and other charities to help their fellow citizens. Owner-operators and trucking companies were already working on delivering vital supplies to storm-affected regions.

While first responders rightfully receive recognition for their efforts during crises, many people overlook the crucial role of disaster relief truck drivers. These dedicated professionals navigate treacherous conditions to deliver essential supplies like food and water to those in need.

At Infinit-I Workforce Solutions, a safety company based out of western Arkansas that has spent the last 25 years facilitating online safety training for trucking companies and school bus drivers across the U.S., a need was seen to help drivers as they head into potentially dangerous areas. The company has released two of their videos to the public via YouTube in an effort to help keep drivers safe.

One video shares important information for truck drivers driving in rainy conditions, pedestrians, animals, and other obstacles are extremely hard to spot and even harder to avoid. In this animated video, learn how to be safe before you get on the road and while driving in the rain. The other video is for school bus drivers which discusses how to avoid high-water situations when operating a school bus and covers emergency procedures for coping with flood hazards.
