What Role Do Community Programs Play in Driving the Child and Youth Services Market's Growth?

The benefits derived from community programs for children and youth have significantly boosted the growth of the child and youth services market. According to youth.gov, young individuals who have a variety of opportunities available to them tend to exhibit less risky behavior in their adulthood. A study indicated that youth involved in the 4-H youth development program for the first five years displayed a lower risk of encountering social and personal behavioral problems. This group of youth were also found four times more likely to contribute positively to their communities and twice as likely to be actively involved in civic affairs. Such factors are predicted to exert a positive influence on the growth of the child and youth services market.
