“Ten organizations who are champions of meaningful change will be eligible to receive a $30,000 Catalyst Award in the spring of this year,” said Dave A. Chokshi, MD, MSc., chair, Common Health Coalition, who helped spearhead the NYC Public Health Corps, a program to connect the work of Community Health Workers (CHWs) at the City's public hospital system and public health department, during his tenure as health commissioner for New York City.

The Catalyst Award program nomination process was announced last month at the Common Health Challenge - Community Health Workers: Catalysts for a Reimagined Health System virtual event. The Catalyst Awards will be given to 10 organizations that share learnings and best practices from their own work, inform the development of pillars of sustainable partnerships for CHW initiatives, and advance stronger partnerships between health care and public health within their current programs. The organizations must demonstrate existing work and/or a strong capacity to integrate CHWs in ways that strengthen partnerships between health care and public health in communities.

The Common Health Challenge is a new annual call-to-action for Common Health Coalition members and partners to rally around a critical health system-wide issue that strengthens collaboration between health care and public health systems. To learn how to join the Challenge or nominate an organization for a Catalyst Award, visit CommonHealthCoalition.org/challenge. The Common Health Challenge will support communities throughout the U.S. in stewarding locally driven, collaborative CHWs programs. These programs will advance the Coalition's focus on health care and public health partnership, and the goal of improving community health, increasing preparedness and value across local healthcare and public health systems and reinforcing the impact of health care and public health professionals.

The Common Health Coalition was founded by five leading health care organizations — AHIP, the Alliance of Community Health Plans, the American Hospital Association, the American Medical Association, and Kaiser Permanente — to ensure the U.S. health system is ready to confront the next crisis via strengthened partnerships between health care and public health. This is being done by collaboration between the U.S. health care and public health systems, and by translating the lessons learned from the COVID-19 pandemic into lessons mobilized for action. In addition to shining a spotlight on exemplary organizations and work — particularly those at the state and local level — the Coalition offers technical assistance in the form of webinars, tools, network building, and case studies to help member organizations advance partnerships between health care and public health.

The Common Health Challenge will advance the Coalition’s goal to identify, amplify and replicate the innovations already happening across the country and create a movement of organizations committed to doing away with existing siloes that hinder progress and expanding effective work happening at the intersection of health care and public health. The annual Common Health Challenge is made possible with expert advising from the National Association of Community Health Workers and HealthBegins.
