World album, which ignited his passion for lyricism and storytelling. Since then, he has honed his craft and embraced his roots in both the performative arts and the world of hip hop. With inspiration drawn from his father's 90s music label and his grandfather's nonprofit theater program, Markas is a product of a successful legacy that fuels his creativity and musical drive.

“Cal Worthington” marks a pivotal moment in his artistic evolution, as it is part of his 'Pray to Petty God' EP and the larger trilogy project that also includes his earlier releases Year 15 and Pray to Petty God. The full-length album showcases the depth of Markas' lyricism, observations and storytelling abilities, while offering a blend of new and nostalgic sounds that fans of the “art of rap” will not want to miss.

Filmed and Directed by Natho and Plex of OG Media, the concept for the new "Cal Worthington" music video is both visually striking and emotionally poignant, paying tribute to the iconic '80s and '90s Cal Worthington car dealership commercials. In a creative twist, the video is set in a scrapyards filled with old cars, representing how these dealerships may have disappeared, but the hustle and grind of life, much like Markas' music, do continue. The symbolic imagery is complemented by the track's message of personal empowerment in both life and business.

As Markas raps, "They say a man seeking revenge should dig two graves," he sets the tone for a powerful track that resonates with listeners looking for raw honesty and inspiration. "If you are looking for a car go see Cal, if you are looking for the money, come see us, because my God don't play about me." Markas' bold lyrics strike a cord with music lovers of all generations, teaching lessons about American life and business. According to 24Hip-Hop, this song transcends traditional rap music, offering a message of both resilience and introspection. Sways Universe celebrated the single, calling it "an anthem for its infectious energy and lyricism".

Markas is currently on a mission to bring his signature music to new fans everywhere, continuing to release exciting projects that showcase his lyrical versatility blended with modern artistry. To stay up on
